

BIBLICAL AND THEOLOGICAL STUDIES MAJOR

The purpose of Biblical and Theological Studies is to familiarize students with the content of the Bible, methodologies for the interpretation and the application of biblical teaching, and the research tools and resources necessary to pursue independent study of biblical texts and topics. It also enables students to evaluate critically their own theology, be aware and respectful of diverse theological positions and traditions, apply a variety of ethical approaches to the question of the church's role in society, and articulate their convictions thoughtfully and charitably.

In both required and elective courses, students develop skills that enable them to take into account the original linguistic, literary, historical, and cultural contexts of the Bible; study major events of Christian history, including the formation of creedal and confessional statements that have shaped church history; reflect on Christian doctrine in light of this tradition in conversation with their reading of Scripture; and consider diverse and global expressions of evangelicalism.

The Biblical and Theological Studies major meets the undergraduate requirements for seminary study suggested by the Association of Theological Schools in the United States and Canada (ATS). Students contemplating graduate studies should consult with the institution in which they are interested to be informed of any particular undergraduate courses needed. Students interested in an accelerated curriculum leading to the bachelor's and master's degrees should consult with their advisors regarding the prerequisites for the Wheaton graduate program.
